MOVING BEYOND THE BINARY: EXPLORING THE DIMENSIONS OF PARENT-CHILD CONTACT PROBLEMS

Michael Saini, Ph.D., Professor, Factor-Inwentash Chair in Law and Social Work, University of Toronto and AFCC (International) President Elect

Parent-child contact problems arising from high-conflict separations have often been attributed to intimate partner violence (IPV) or parental alienation (PA), leading to a binary conceptualization that oversimplifies the complex realities of families. In this presentation, Professor Michael Saini will challenge this binary perspective and explore the intricate dimensions contributing to parent-child contact difficulties. By synthesizing existing literature, empirical data, and in-depth case analyses, Prof. Saini will highlight the multifaceted factors influencing the emergence, persistence, and resolution of parent-child contact problems. Beyond examining the roles of IPV and PA, we will consider the broader ecosystem of influences, including psychological, legal, social, and systemic factors. This multidimensional approach seeks to unravel these elements' intricate interplay and impact on parent-child relationships. Recognizing the intricate web of influences allows for developing tailored interventions and legal strategies that address families' unique needs and vulnerabilities in navigating these challenging circumstances. By striving to broaden our understanding of this complex issue, Prof. Saini will offer a more nuanced and empathetic perspective that acknowledges the intersectionality of the multiple factors that can influence PCCP, emphasizing the need for holistic, context-sensitive approaches to supporting families.

BEYOND THE LABEL OF “HIGH-CONFLICT”: FOCUSING ON TRUST AND RESPECT IN COPARENTING RELATIONSHIPS

Michael Saini, Ph.D., Professor, Factor-Inwentash Chair in Law and Social Work, University of Toronto and AFCC (International) President Elect

In the realm of family law, the term "high-conflict" often takes center stage as a catch-all phrase to describe intense disputes and strained interactions. However, an exclusive focus on high conflict can have significant limitations, hindering our ability to understand, address, and ultimately resolve complex issues effectively. This workshop aims to shed light on the drawbacks of fixating on the "high-conflict" label. The workshop will offer strategies to navigate these limitations, including the importance of understanding root causes and fostering trust and respect in relationships. We will explore the emotional and psychological impact of the high-conflict label, encouraging a more empathetic and solution-oriented approach to disputes.

Learning Objectives

- Explore the limitations of focusing exclusively on levels of conflict.
- Gain knowledge of the research that supports positive coparenting relationships.
- Enhance trust and respect to support conflict reduction and parents reaching coparenting agreements.

NEURODIVERSE CHILDREN AND PARENTS IN FAMILY COURT

Dr. Daniel B. Pickar, Ph.D.,
American Board of Professional Psychology

Within the family court system, neurodiversity (ND) is a much less recognized and far less discussed area of diversity than other traditional issues such as cultural and gender diversity, as well as non-traditional families. The neurodiversity perspective, while having its' limitations, can help reduce bias in family court by recognizing that there is a broad range of brain functioning, while taking a strengths-based approach, as opposed to a pathology orientation. There have been recent positive developments in our field regarding neurodiversity in children, as exemplified by increasing attention paid to the unique considerations of children with special needs in families undergoing separation and divorce. This keynote presentation will begin with an overview of the topic of neurodiversity with children and adults, while addressing the various diagnostic categories which fall under this new framework. Noted will be some of the specific challenges for attorneys, judges, and mental health professionals when assisting a family with either a neurodiverse child or parent. Other specific topic areas to be covered include a presentation of a risk-assessment model for use in parenting plan development and decision-making determinations in families with a neurodiverse child, as well as the unique vulnerabilities of many neurodiverse children to resist-refuse and child alienation dynamics. Additionally, some of the unique parental gatekeeping dynamics arising in post-divorce families with an ND child will be elucidated, as well as the challenges of "listening to the voice" of the ND child with poor intellectual or language skills. Case examples from parenting plans evaluations conducted by the presenter will help illustrate the application of these concepts to family law work.
